Occurrence

Dry too much water is ordinarily an end result of a 'laryngospasm' that takes place because of an automatic shrinkage of the laryngeal cords. The particular laryngeal cords have a tendency to reduce when they detect water, or any kind of fruit juice on its way in, which leads to a shortterm blockage of oxygen getting into the lungs. For this reason, even a near-drowning event might result in dry drowning and death, as a result of the laryngeal cords compacting when even the smallest amount of water tries in order to move into the lungs.

When the Larynx Closes Itself, the Entry of Oxygen to the Lungs is Cut Off

Nevertheless, the heart carries on with the act of pumping blood in to the lungs, as well as a little amount of blood gets into the airspace in the lung area. This results in the victim drowning in his or her own fluids or perhaps dying because of hypoxia. It is considered that dry drowning is experienced within 1-24 hours after the water or fruit juice coming into the lungs.
